Campagne climbing

The Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation has given a $43 million campaign for Trinity, which is one of four major campaigns for the enhancement of teaching, learning, and research throughout the College. Such endowments directly enhance the quality of Trinity education by helping to attract outstanding teachers – like Professors Salbu – from around the world.

Although the College is still in its ‘soft phase’, the progress that has been made will be reflected in the Foundation’s $43 million contribution, if the project is completed on time. As of now, the College has still a long way to go before it can offer ‘needs-based’ places – that is, to those of limited resources regardless of their talent.

The Board of Management has recently approved the plans for the multi-million-dollar building project and the substantial addition of four new dormitories. However, a ‘soft phase’ of the project will be necessary to ensure that such a project is successful.

Inaugural scholarship winners

Made possible by the generosity of the benefactors, the College this year welcomed the first recipients of several new scholarships.

From Euhuah in northern Victoria, Kate Calb (2005) was Physiotherapy. Not only is the inaugural recipient of the ‘First-Year Scholarship’; she is also a member of the ‘First-Year’ people, for whose scholarship it is named.

With five other Indigenous students at Trinity, four non-Indigenous students, and one non-resident, the College’s Indigenous scholarship program was featured in the Education Age from 20 to April. Trinity is one of only two universities outside Trinity College, Melbourne Business School (MBS), Trinity College, and the wider University of Melbourne, this professorship is the practical expression of Trinity alumnus John Gourlay’s strong belief that ‘the exercise of leadership in business’ can only be achieved by the best graduates.
